

They won the bourgeois and the niggers (op.cit.page 174)

Apr. 27th, 2025

 Send to Kindle

“Drift” by Paul Fortune

self-published, Paris, 2021, pp. 246

We selected this novel because of the Celtic star on its cover. This novel elevated us to the heights of a lost ideal: that of “White Europe....This is a dream worth sacrificing one’s life for, and even more so, one’s soul” (op. cit., page 62). We loved it simply because it’s Islamophobic. “What do you do when you’re young, stuck in a dead-end job in the depths of a grim suburb, surrounded by immigration? For Michaël, the solution is simple: he becomes an activist in a small nationalist group. (This group is called the “Union of European Patriots – UPE” – note to us). Between fights and martial speeches, he firmly believes that the decisive moment will come to act to overthrow this sick society that he hates. In the meantime, he follows his work colleague Chérif to a boxing gym to learn how to punch and tries to have a love affair with the pretty Mathilde he met at a demonstration. But through disappointments and betrayals, through constantly brooding against the whole world, he begins to think that there will be nothing for him, not today, not tomorrow, not ever. Deep down, he is perhaps simply very alone. All this is going to end badly, that’s for sure” (copied from the cover on the back).

Even though homophobic quotes are everywhere, we really liked this novel. Paul Fortune is none other than Romain Tuilier (born in 1975), an author from Transboréal. He self-published his second novel, “Dérive – Drift” because it is very militant for the far right. Our hero, “Michael wonders what it will be like the day half the cops are Arab” (op.cit., page 157). We liked a homophobic quote against Claude François simply because the latter represents disco. “Besides, this guy was a pervert who died electrocuted in his bath by an electric dildo” (op.cit., page 34). The hero, Michael, is also a boxer like our favorite Johan Livernette, about whom we have already written three articles. “Romain Tuilier (alias Paul Fortune – note to us) practiced boxing for a long time, drove heavyweights...” (copied from the Transboréal publisher’s website).

You have to reach page 212 to realize that “the problem is demographic...there aren’t enough of us, we haven’t convinced anyone all these years” (op. cit., page 212). “The sheep will remain sheep” (op. cit., page 232). Michael “believed himself to be at the forefront of a white revolution that was always coming, he believed himself to be among the saviors of this mass who ultimately have no other oppression to suffer than that of their own degradation” (op. cit., page 230). In the final pages, Michael walks toward a mosque holding a bomb in his arms. Will he succeed? It’s up to you to read the end.

written by Dionysos ANDRONIS